Foreword

I HAVE long known the house of Robinson & Farr, of Philadelphia. It has been my good fortune to have found there many fine examples of art with which to enrich my own collection. I know well the contents of their galleries. What is here said is the voluntarily cheerful word of one who knows this house so favorably that he can express, without reserve, his trust and confidence in its honor.

The art works now offered by Robinson & Farr at public sale may be commended to discriminating collectors. They are of the same high standard and pure period quality which have always marked the selections of this firm. It is a satisfaction to the buyer to attend a sale with confidence; to know that that which is presented has been selected by those who know what good and pure things are and that the descriptive catalogue can be depended upon as placing on record nothing but facts. That satisfaction the buyer at this sale may have.

To the true collector it is distasteful to associate art with the world's mart. It can hardly be overlooked, however, that money judiciously spent in this direction is well invested. If history repeats itself, and it always does, the numbers here offered the public give an opportunity not only for the enrichment and the uplift of the home, the pleasing sense of possession of the best things, but also offers the opportunity to make a wise investment.
